

Paradeisos: Christopher Koller

Christopher Kollers photographs dont strive for the ideal view, but for a view that is different, unexpectedly beautiful or jarring. The blurred edges of plants and buildings bleed into one another and generate a sense of restless movement, a feeling that we cant quite focus on any one point - as though we were moving though the landscape of a dream. Produced between 1997 and 2009, the scope of Paradeisos is vast, taking us from Zen Gardens in Kyoto to a roadside in West Hollywood, from Marie Antoinettes simulations of peasant life in Versailles to the grounds of the Heide Museum of Modern Art in Melbourne. The diversity of locations portrayed reflects both Kollers insatiable curiosity for travel and also the nomadic lifestyle of many contemporary artists. Residencies in Italy, Japan, Spain and the USA have allowed the expansion of the Paradeisos series and have also helped to define Kollers artistic practice more broadly. Gardens always embody a tension between order and predictability as planned designs are subject to the random workings of the natural world. Christopher Kollers choice of equipment - a cheap plastic camera - doubles this. The photographers control of the photograph is in constant play with the unpredictable effects of the camera and its distortions. Koller delights in the cameras mistakes: its limited focus, unexpected bursts of colour, and tendency to reveal artefacts of the negative. In Paradeisos, these camera-effects blend with the gardens, and with the tension and play that we find in the combination of careful organisation with unruly nature.
